MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

Diversified nonchalance

For those who like their travel destination unpredictable, Marin County, California reigns supreme in the United States . As one travels north from San Francisco over the Golden Gate Bridge , a county of incredible diversity and spectacular beauty awaits. Named for the tenacious Indian Chief Marin , who harassed the Spaniards here continually in the early 1800 s, this county, wedged between the San Francisco Bay and its tributaries, and the Pacific Ocean encompasses nearly 2/3 of protected open space. Only one freeway (Highway 101, also known as the Redwood Highway) (travels through) the county and no train or subway exists to lighten an increasingly aggravating rush hour crunch Marin County residents voted against the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) system early on in its development, a typically Marin ? response to intrusions into the landscape as is. Two ferry systems, the Golden Gate Ferry (which also runs the county bus service) and the Blue and Gold Fleet carry commuters back and forth from two Marin locations Sausalito and Larkspur Landing to and from San Francisco. Although the trip is most always longer than the freeway hop it is always a sensational trip. In the summer, true to Mark Twain s well-quoted lament, San Francisco can be mired in dense fog requiring a warm outer lawyer that must be peeled off in the warm Marin sunshine. In the fall, warm weather prevails over all. In winter, the trip might necessitate a cup of warm coffee, indoors, as the rain falls relentlessly.

Much as the weather in varying parts of Marin County can range 20 30 degrees warmer than

San Francisco, the various towns and cities in the county vary intensely in both temperature and personality. Each has plenty of attitude, quite sure it s got the best of everything the county has to offer. Each, to some extent is right. And, even within one particular locality, there s enough variety existing coincident with characteristic tolerance, to assure a visit that will never bore, and could take a lifetime to adequately explore.

In this writing I introduce Sausalito, the first city over the bridge and bay front, picturesque beyond belief, reminiscent to many of the Amalfi coast, the Mediterrean at its American best! Shortly after September 11, 2001, my company was hired to create a television advertising campaign to draw people from within the state to Sausalito, as air travel was at a standstill. Our theme was " Christmas in Sausalito, Europe by the Bay," and the response was outstanding. Showcasing this gem throughout the state interested the news media as well, and many stations ran our commercials in prime time, without us having to buy the media time. The city recouped tourist dollars while introducing itself to a whole new group of what would become repeat customers. That creative little project is indicative of the seaside town itself - it only needs to show its charm once, and the visitor, whether from in-state or the other side of the world, is forever captivated.
